RESEARCH

Do EV Charging Stations Care about Electricity Rates? Job Market Paper
Supported in part by the Environmental Science and Policy Program, Michigan State University

- I study the effect of electricity prices on market entry of electric vehicle (EV) charging stations. I compile a novel dataset that links commercial electricity prices to charging stations across U.S. zip codes from 2015–2022. I translate complex pricing schedules into a standardized cost metric by constructing station-level load profiles based on observed charging sessions and calculating the resulting monthly electricity bills for those stations. Employing synthetic control and local projection difference-in-differences methods, I estimate the effects of new price schedules for EV charging stations—introduced to reduce high demand charges—on both station electricity costs and market entry. The results show that these schedules substantially lowered demand charges for DC fast charging stations and increased entry of any charging port by 1–1.5 units per zip code, underscoring the role of targeted rate design in accelerating EV infrastructure growth.

The Impact of Extended Driver's License Renewal on Fatal Crashes Among Older Maryland Drivers Across Urban and Rural Areas
(with Heesu Kim)

- We examine the impact of Maryland's driver's license renewal period extension on fatal crashes involving senior drivers using county-level data from 2012–2019 and the Synthetic Difference-in-Differences method. Results indicate an increase in fatal crashes among older drivers, particularly in urban counties, with some estimates statistically significant. The findings suggest that renewal cycle extensions may exacerbate crash risks for senior drivers, especially in urban areas.
